Boykin and the Card of the Baptist Society at Salem.

In the Salem Review of the 27th ultimo is published a card by authority of a special meeting of the Baptist Society at Salem. This card relates to the disgusting and criminal affair at McMinville, in which one W. F. Boykin is stated to be guilty of the seduction of the daughter of a brother minister, committed while he was a guest at the house of the latter. The card also states that Boykin has not been prosecuted for the act. The reason given is that the criminal code of Oregon does not make it punishable, and the society in view of this fact call upon the Legislature "to do something to protect families and innocent daughters from the brutal lusts and debauchery of unprincipled villains, however holy their faith or sanctified their positions." Some of our contemporaries of the press have also suggested the same thing.

We respect the feelings and sentiments which have prompted the society to say and do what they have in this matter. In the eye of both God and man, no more unworthy, dishonorable or criminal act than the one laid to the charge of Boykin could be committed by any person. But before any change to the law be made, it may be well to calmly and dispassionately consider the matter. Laws founded upon the circumstances of a particular case are almost sure to be inadequate to the general condition of society. The prayer or recommendation of the Society is that a law be enacted making punishable the simple act of seduction. We say simple, not because we wish to speak of the act as a thing other than sinful and wrong in itself, but to separate it from those instances where by reason of the aggravating or particular circumstances which attend the commission of the act, it is already made punishable.

These are—1. Where a female of previous chaste character is seduced under promise of marriage. 2. Where two persons unmarried to each other, cohabit together as man and wife. 3. Where the act is committed between persons who are related to each other within the degrees of consanguinity within which marriage is prohibited.

In all ages of the Christian world fornication has been considered a sin, but at common law it was never punished as a crime. In England up to the time of the Reformation, persons guilty of this act were amenable to ecclesiastical censure. The punishments inflicted were spiritual penance and did not extend to body or estate. The guilty party might be relieved from the penance enjoined by the payment of a sum of money, "it being usual in those courts," as Sir William Blackstone humorously remarks, "to exchange their spiritual censures for a round compensation in money, perhaps because honesty is generally esteemed by the parolists as the best medicine for saluting crime!" for the salvation of the soul. But after the Reformation this spiritual jurisdiction fell into disuse, and is long since gone out of practice.

In some few of the United States simple fornication is punished as a crime, but generally this is not the case, and the matter stands at common law. In this State it was never declared a crime. The Code Commission of 1853 reported a section making it punishable as a crime, but the Legislature refused to pass it. All things considered, it appears very questionable policy to change the law in this particular. To enforce a law fully and fairly, making the simple act a crime, will involve an espionage and prying into private conduct that would be extremely offensive to the community. All other cases are provided for, unless it be where the sin is committed, as in Boykin's case, while the man is a guest of the father of the woman. Should such a circumstance take the case out of the general rule? At first blush it looks as if the answer should be in the affirmative. But even in such a case the woman may be as much to blame as the man, and even the parents of the former may be very much in fault in the matter. Without wishing to wound the feelings of these sorrowing parents, we might cite the fact in justification of this remark, that at the very time they took this man Boykin to their house and set him down in the sanctuary of the family, he was regarded by many of the community as a wandering vagabond, who had left his family in the East and was making a pretense of his ministerial character to prey and prowl upon society at large. Indeed the rumor was rife that he had been guilty of incestuousness, or conduct approaching it, and communications or paragraphs to that effect had been published in the Salem papers. To harbor such a man dangerously in a family of young women was a grievous indiscretion on the part of these parents, and it is grievously hard that they answered it. The law cannot supply the place of parental control and chaperonage, and it would be worse than folly to attempt it.

In this view of the case we lay out of consideration the stories of "drugging" which were current when this affair first became public. We take it for granted that these were exaggerations, because were the fact otherwise we presume Boykin would long since have been arrested for the same. The law is well settled that when a woman is overcome by such means she does not consent, and the act amounts to rape and is punishable as such.

The society seems also to complain of the law punishing adultery, that the complaint can only be made by "the injured husband or wife." In Boykin's case, as his wife is in the East, this is an apparent impunity to the adulterer. But no law can be made to reach every individual case with like certainty, and at the same time be governed by any general principle. The punishment of adultery by statute is an innovation upon the common law and is only allowed as a means of redress to the party particularly injured—namely, the husband or wife. Society has no interest in the peace of families, and the sanctity and perpetuity of the marriage relation than it has in the punishment of adulterers. Therefore the law does not allow such peace to be disturbed or relation to be broken up by a prosecution for adultery on the complaint of any one who may choose for any reason to charge a man or woman into court upon such a charge, to the utter ruin of his or her companion and family. We think this provision of our law a wise one, and worthy to remain upon the statute book.

Finally, we venture to add, with all respect to the Baptist Society at Salem, that they take all proper occasions to urge upon the public, and particularly upon their charge, to guard their households against the admission of unprincipled and suspected characters—that they remember the words of Esau, made holy writ by St. Paul, "Evil communications corrupt good manners," that they be vigilant to exclude from their "innocent daughters" and sons, as well, that without the influence of the day, which by first purporting the mind, corrupts the heart and the affections, and leads it to regard the institution of marriage as a tyrannical restraint upon their natural affections and desires, and which teaches that men and women are subject to no restraint in the gratification of their passions except those which are of convenience, external decency, or the so-called "law of love" (that) may impose.

We think this the correct and efficient remedy for the evil of which they so justly complain, and hope that they and others will agree with us and act accordingly.

Meeting of the Senate.

Sept. 6.—The second annual session of the Oregon Legislature opened today at 10 o'clock. There were fully 500 delegates present, representing nearly all the States in the Union. The Senate was called to order by the speaker, and the House of Representatives by the speaker. The session was opened with a prayer by the chaplain, and the reading of the Declaration of Independence. The session continued until 4 o'clock, when it adjourned.

WHISKY!

THIS BRAND HAS BEEN KNEW FOR YEARS
as being a PURE, VALUABLE ARTICLE distilling in France. But several parties are now offering it under the name of "Cutler's"
brand, in many cases using my bottles.
Purchases will be careful and see that my signature is on the cork.
For sale by all respectable grocers and all Wholesale and Retailers.
